Tapping Into The Power of Good In Society through HBCU-Led Community Development

Benedict-Allen Community Development Corporation

Larry K. Salley, MSW, MPA, MBA

Executive Director
Mission

- The Benedict-Allen Community Development Corporation was established in 1995 by Benedict College, a Historically Black College, located in Columbia, SC.

- The agency was formed as a vehicle to focus college resources on revitalization efforts in the Waverly and Read Street communities that surround the campus.

- The primary objective is to serve as a catalyst for change by combining public and private resources to accomplish common goals.

Keys to Successful HBCU Led Development

- Establish and maintain strong communication with target area residents and community leaders throughout the planning, implementation and evaluation phase of projects.
- Develop a comprehensive agreement that defines the roles of the institution and its partners with specific goals and objectives.
- Create a process to hire, compensate, promote, and retain competent leadership within the institution and develop a succession plan for future growth in community-based organizations.
- Develop diverse funding streams which provide flexibility when addressing community needs.
- Create opportunities for projects and activities that promote community economic development and promote sustainability.
Conclusion

Benedict College has been successful for the past ten years employing a strategy of comprehensive development, community coordination while utilizing its CDC as a tool for outreach.

Similar models can be effective in other communities, but we must recognize that there are constraints to affordable re-development within distressed communities.

In order to ensure success, the right model for development must be used.
